She mentioned attending the Trails for People and Wildlife session, that it is a tool for evaluating trail location in relation to sensitive landscapes. The last session attended was the Restoring Streams Naturally with Wood. She stated the presentation was interesting and showed the benefits of this practice. She also mentioned some attendees spoke about concerns with large woody material in rivers causing issues.

Dylan Dowe gave a brief overview of the sessions attended. He attended the Global Stake of Climate and Clean Energy and there was a lot of discussion about strategies for energy from a global to local scale. The next session attended was Conserving the NH Mahoosucs. He stated it was interesting because it was a small community with little funds, but they worked with various agencies to conserve 4,600 acres. This conservation area serves to protect the Androscoggin River Basin. The last session he attended dealt with natural resource inventories. The presentation was led by Moosewood Ecological and there were discussions about better methods for inventorying and using data.
